If the mass of a black hole is more than $10^7 M_{\odot}$ is it still a black hole? If it is not a black hole does it not affect its gravity? For example does it affect the orbits of nearby star or planets? A: Black holes of a mass smaller than $10^7 M_{\odot}$ are called stellar mass black holes, and those of mass greater than $10^7 M_{\odot}$ are supermassive black holes. As far as I can tell, very little is known about the properties of "stellar" black holes. They are basically only a theoretical concept, and are used when studying general relativity in terms of specific examples of rapidly rotating non-maximal spinning black holes (see e.g. So one important difference between a black hole and a star is that the gravity of a black hole is so strong that an object would need to be closer than $10^{10} M_{\odot}$ to get into orbit around a black hole. So a black hole does not affect the orbits of nearby star or planets. (The black hole may affect some of the star's stars, and those stars would respond by orbiting the black hole, but other stars would not be affected.) An exception is if
